

ESA
Home
Understanding Our Planet
Securing Our Environment
Benefiting Our Economy

20-Jun-2011

About Observing the Earth

- How does Earth Observation work?
- How to get Earth observation data
- Integrating Earth Observation in your job
- Earth Observation users speak
- EO programmes
- The Living Planet
- GMES
- ESA's Earth Observing missions
- Envisat overview
- ERS overview
- Earth Explorers overview
- Sentinels overview
- MSG overview
- MetOp overview
- Proba-1 overview
- Third Party Missions overview
- Opportunities with us
- ...

Multimedia ...

Services

- Calendar
- Subscribe
- Search

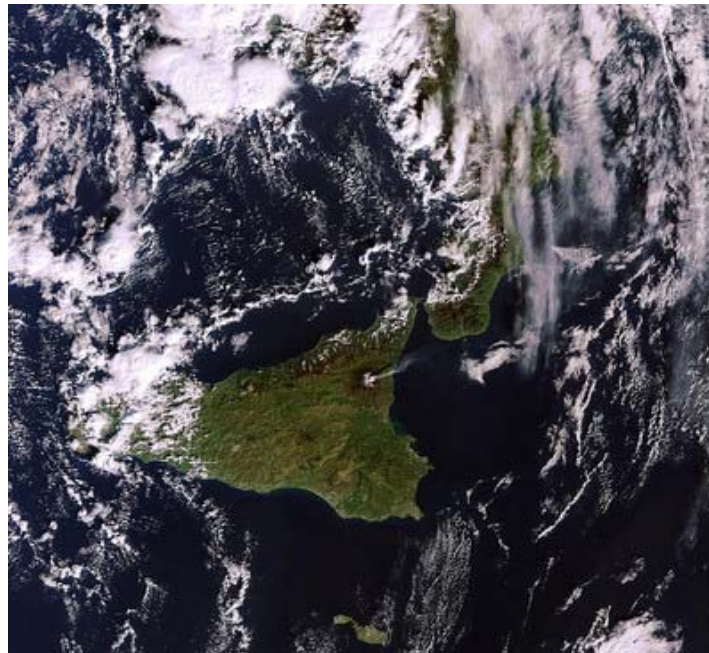

All
 Observing the Earth

Article Images

Mount Etna bursts into life – new image

14 January 2011

Back to article

Download: HI-RES JPEG (Size: 1174 kb)

This Envisat MERIS image, acquired on 11 January 2011, shows the plume of smoke billowing into the atmosphere from Mount Etna, Sicily, Italy. Activity gradually increased the following day, peaking in the evening.

Credits: ESA

Related news

Insight into volcanic eruptions, courtesy of space

Envisat keeping an eye on the Eyjafjallajökull volcano

Hot stuff – 15 years of satellite data over Mt. Etna

Mt. Etna – at it again

Related links

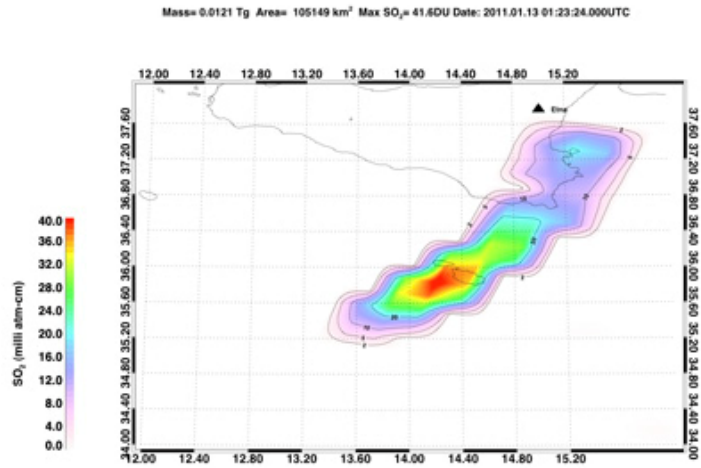

- Support to Aviation for Volcanic Ash Avoidance
- Norwegian Institute for Air Research
- Aqua-AIRS

In depth

Data User Element (DUE)

Back to article

Download: HI-RES JPEG (Size: 272 kb)

This image, which was acquired by the Atmospheric Infrared Sounder on NASA's EOS-AQUA satellite, shows the plume of sulphur dioxide being carried over the Mediterranean Sea.

Credits: NASA, Norwegian Institute for Air Research

Copyright 2000 - 2011 © European Space Agency. All rights reserved.